The Motorola Foundation, the philanthropic arm of Motorola, is a proud sponsor of the One World, One Sky: Big Bird's Adventure show at Adler Planetarium.

As a company that's dedicated to advancing the way the world connects, the people of Motorola are excited to help the children of Chicago realize their connection to the children of China through our common sky.

Motorola has connected with China since 1987 as one of the first multinational companies to establish operations in the country. Committed to being a good corporate citizen wherever we operate, our contributions in China include the Project Hope schools, disaster relief and environmental initiatives that demonstrate collaboration across borders.

We support the community right here in our hometown of Chicago too through support for the arts and education programs that inspire the next generation of inventors to embrace science, technology, engineering and math. Since 2000, the Motorola Foundation has contributed $41 million to education programming. Plus, our employees have contributed thousands of volunteer hours to organizations that need our help.

At Motorola, we understand that being a good corporate citizen involves more than community investment. We also are actively engaged in improving the environmental profile of our products, reducing the carbon footprint of our operations, improving supply chain conditions for our industry and building a diverse workforce.
